Summary Analysis

The steady progression of artificial intelligence (AI) demand from basic infrastructure into end-user applications drove a major restructuring of the global IT industry supply chain in 2025. Strong industry demand for Taiwan's capabilities in high performance computing, AI, and advanced production led to a strong upswing in exports during the first half of that year. Although global inventory adjustments and pull-through dynamics decelerated this trend during the second half of 2025, Taiwan retains strong resilience for continued growth. U.S. tariff policies and geopolitics are key variables with the potential to disrupt supply chains, with pressure from external uncertainties exerting a retarding effect on global economic growth. The global economy, marked by bullish optimism on technology and weak economic fundamentals, is caught between two very different potential trajectories going forward. The International Monetary Fund foresees global economic growth in 2026 reaching 3%, while Taiwan's Directorate General of Budget, Accounting and Statistics expects the country's economy to grow by a significantly higher 11.05%, indicating Taiwan's economy is in a sustained period of structural growth.

Looking at the international shipping market, 2026 promises to remain a year of challenges fed by the continued imbalance between shipping capacity supply and demand, route changes and reallocations, and shakeups in ocean shipping alliances. In facing the current high variability affecting the global business environment, TIPC will continue to anticipate and adapt to ongoing trends, use technological innovation to spur substantive value transformation, and deepen the sustainability of its port network to steadily reach new milestones in the internationalization and smart optimization of all TIPC business interests.
